Introduction

[jazzy piano chords, bass strumming with smooth R&B]

Qudsiya Naqui 0:09

How has technology changed the lives of disabled people during the covid 19 pandemic?

Aimi Hamraie 0:15

Technology can both, like, liberate us and it can kind of like, trap us and constrain us. And that's because it's a thing that you know people have designed and it's not always designed that keeps everybody in mind.

Qudsiya Naqui 0:37

How do we bring disability history, culture and pride to K through 12 education? How do we ensure that the promise of the ADA extends to disabled immigrants,?

Katherine Perez 0:49

Immigration itself has essentially function in the US as a program of eugenics.

This is Qudsiya Naqui. We'll explore all of these questions and more during Season Two of Down to the Struts coming to your podcast feeds on February 16. Tune in for more conversations about disability, design, and the need to find intersectional solutions to complex problems. In the meantime, check out our website at [www.Down to the struts.com](http://www.Down to the struts.com). Subscribe, rate, and review the podcast on Apple podcasts, Spotify, Stitcher, or wherever you love to listen. You can also follow us on Facebook, Twitter, and Instagram at Down to the Struts. As you await season two, feel free to tune back in to season one. If you like what you hear, share with friends. I'm so excited for February 16 so we can get back down to it.
